Original Poetry.

[For the Palladium.] TO ABBY.

BY MRS. A. D. HEMENWAY.

Bright shows the sun when for the West, Abby, I saw thee start, Yet still a cloud of despest gloom, Was shading over my heart. Yet when thy parting kiss was giv'n -Between a fear and smile, With anguish deep, thy mother's heart

Now thou art gone, how sad and lone Is the forsaken nest; I long to see thy face again, And clasp thee to my breart. Yes oft for thee my absent one, My bosom heaves a sigh, Thou art as fondly cherished now, As if thou still were nigh.

Seem'd breaking e'en the while.

I miss thee, in the evening hours, Thou hast so oft beguit'd, Amid those pensive bours, my heart Still yearns for thee my child. I miss thy fond bright smile, that fill'd Thine eyes in days before; While seated by thy mother's side Conning thy lessons o'er.

Alithen, I feared it would be thus, That in some future day, Thou'd leave thy early home and friends, And from thy mother stray. Now, thou art in a stranger's home, And stranger's voices there, To greet thee in the morning hour, ;

And mid the evening air. And thou, may'st list but list invain, To hear thy mother's voice, That oft in young life's early years, Has made thy heart rejoice. Yet still, within thy mother's heart, Affection lives as true, I love as well, as in those years,"

Say, Abby near, do you?

A teacher's task, thy early choice, Devolves upon thee now, God grant, its cares and toils may bring, No shades upon thy brow. O, may life's path, ne'er prove to thee, A dark and tedious way, May gladness ever shed for thee, Its bright and joyous ray-

Yet still, methicks I see thine eyes, Oft languishing with care, Then with a mother's fervent love, I breathen whispered pray'r, That Got may shield thy youthful head, And art my fact-steps guide, His holy word, thy anchor be, Turough life's eventful tide. Luntow, Oct. 10th, 1851.

I From the Washington Globe.] STEWART HOLLAND.

"He had been deputed by the Captain to fire When all hope had fled, and the wrasel nearly level with the sea, Holland was seen busy with heagun. His last shot boomed out as the Artic sank, and he went down with her-persevering in the strict performance of his duty."-[The Rewapuper account. Upon the Artic's deck was seen A noble form, and fair; Firm, resolute amid the gloom And scenes of dark despair!

His car was pierced by shrick and wall, And melancholy strain, Of strugling victims all around, Who sought for help in vaint

Doubtless in that depressing hour Of dismay and pain, He thought of home and lov'd ones far, He'd never see again.

How'er, he did not flee the wreck, To trust the treacherous wave, Which bore some to a succoring hand, But others to the grave.

His post was at the signal gun, "When all the rest had fled," Nor from his duty turned aside, To dying or the dead!

Ah! no response, to cheer, was heard, And hope had well nigh flown; But rumbled still o'er mountain foam The signal's doleful tone!

The noble youth, with brow exposed, Throughout, undaunted stood, Though gathering waters lashed his form To whelm it in the flood.

And calmly with the Artic sunk, While yet the cannon's breath Went moaning o'er the sea's expanse, The signal of his death !

LIFE IN NEW YORK.

THE YOUNG WIFE OF A RICH OLD MAN, -The New York Sun, of Saturday morning last, serves up the following dish of scandal:

"A gentleman about sixty years of age, doing a large importing business in South street, and residing in one of the fashionable avenues in this city, for some months suspected his wife," a very handsome with being on more than friendly terms with the son of a wealthy neighbor. On Thursday morning, he announced his intention to leave town on business, and not return until the following morning. He pected (about 11 o'clock at night,) and unlocked the back hall door, with his night-key, not stopping even to ring the bell, and crept stealthily to the door of his room on the second floor and looked through the key-hole, when he saw a light, and imagined that he also saw objects moving in the room. He listened for some moments One of the voices he thought was a man's. His patience now became entirely exhausted, and he attempted to open the door, but found it securely locked on the inside. He listened again, but all was silent .--Determined on knowing the worst, he took from his pocket a revolver, and demanded admission to the room. His demand not being complied with as soon as he thought it should be, he burst open the door, and on doing so, discovered something white leaning on one of the windows of the bed-room. He ran to the window, looked out saw, and discharged one barrel of the revolver at what he took to be his neighbor's son, as he was scaling the fence of his yard, without any other article than his linen on. On looking Just imagine, dear readers, you that about the room, the injured husband espied are mothers-and every woman ought to snugly piled up on a chair at the foot of be one-just imagine nearly two hundred the bed, a pair of pants, in one of the babies; not dolls of gutta percha, lapsus pockets of which, was a port monnaie, lazuli, porcelain or wax, but babies-real containing $103 25; a vest, coat and cratogether, all between the ages of seven a hat and fine gold watch, which, he says, and twelve months, kicking-squirming, the owner can have by calling for and nursing, tooting, crowing, laughing, and proving property.
